

HSUS and HSI wildlife campaigns protect animals from sharks to skunks and help preserve their habitats.

We are... protecting wildlife

Our long-fought battles are having an impact on large-scale cruelties such as shark finning and seal slaughter. We're pushing for tougher laws against captive hunting and the exotic pet trade, protecting wild animals from poaching and habitat loss, and helping people peacefully resolve conflicts with wildlife.

Saying No to Shark Fins

HSUS supporter Judy Ki spent much of 2011 urging anyone who would listen to vote for A.B. 376, a California bill prohibiting the sale, possession, or distribution of shark fins, used in a soup considered a delicacy by some Asian cultures. After their fins are hacked off, the sharks are thrown back into the ocean to drown.

Born and raised in Hong Kong—and the cofounder of the Asian Pacific American Ocean Harmony Alliance—Ki is quick to counter arguments that a ban is culturally discriminatory. “Cultures evolve—extinction is forever,” she says. Her dedication was rewarded when A.B. 376 was signed into law, along with similar bans in Oregon, Washington State, Guam, and Toronto. Meanwhile, Chile and Taiwan adopted strict finning bans in the nations’ waters.

Minding the Wild Kind

To help Maryland’s Greenbelt Homes community keep the peace with its wild neighbors, Lori Thiele with The HSUS’s Humane Wildlife Services squeezes through the “raccoon highway”: an underground network of steam tunnels and crawl spaces. She installs one-way doors and, once the animals vacate, secures the openings so they can’t return. Community maintenance director Matt Berres says hundreds of animals have been saved since 2007, thanks to Thiele’s dedication on more than 80 on-site jobs.

In Wareham, Mass., HWS and HSUS experts also addressed a skunk problem in 2011, sharing simple solutions such as securing garbage and blocking potential den sites. Says police Lt. John Walcek, “Folks that ... were originally ready to hang the skunks up by their tails ... said, ‘You know what? I guess I understand a little better.’” Altogether, HWS helped more than 2,300 wild animals throughout the year.

Despite her misgivings, Lizette Avineri found herself incorporating animal fur into her design sketches at Parsons New School for Design in Manhattan. An HSUS presentation at the top fashion school inspired her to drop the fur—and use her senior thesis to counter Saga Furs’ outreach to Parsons students. Working with materials received through The HSUS’s connections to a Paris-based faux fur company, Avineri earned a coveted spot in the 2011 senior fashion show and a display at Saks Fifth Avenue.

Shaping consciousness in budding designers is just one tool in The HSUS’s arsenal against animal fur in fashion. In 2011, we continued the push for change with shareholder resolutions, consumer alerts, and Federal Trade Commission complaints about animal fur sold as faux.

“ Thank you all for showing me the video; I’ve not seen such before, and I think people will find it edifying to see what some folks call hunting and sport. ... If congresspeople watch this, I think it’s going to probably bring some people to tears because this is really sick and sad. ”

—Rep. Steve Cohen, D-Tenn.

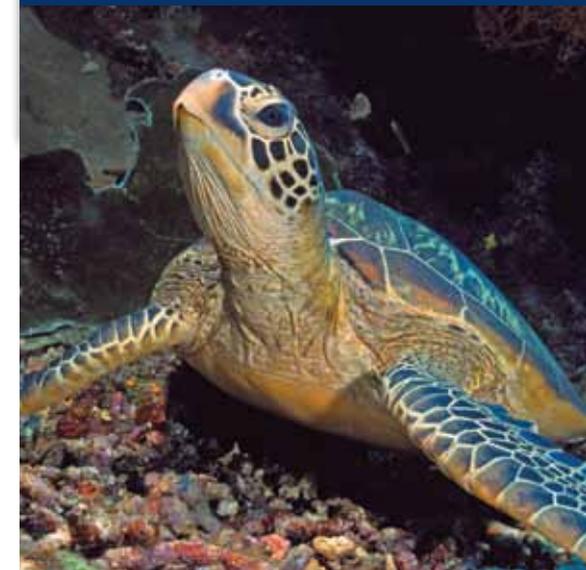

Cohen shared with HSUS staff his reaction to our captive hunting investigation, which aired on Animal Planet in June. Undercover investigators traveled to captive hunting ranches and wildlife auctions in Texas and New York, finding a kangaroo, an endangered oryx, and other semi-tame exotic animals confined in enclosures to be shot for trophies; one operator even admitted to tranquilizing his animals. With Rep. Brad Sherman, D-Calif., Cohen introduced the Sportsmanship in Hunting Act to crack down on facilities like these.

JENNIFER BRAVO Cyber Sleuth on the Case

For three weeks, HSUS member Jennifer Bravo spent evenings surfing the Internet as part of Operation Cyberwild, an investigation into the illegal wildlife trade by the California Department of Fish and Game and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. Using code words provided by federal agents, Bravo and five other HSUS volunteers uncovered sales of items such as sea turtle boots, a leopard fur coat, and an elephant’s foot, plus birds and endangered fish being sold as pets. Acting on the team’s leads, authorities investigated and brought criminal charges against 12 people.

In other 2011 efforts to curb poaching, The HSUS continued donating decoys for authorities to catch poachers in the act, offered $100,000 in rewards to help crack cases, formed an anti-poaching network in California, and helped pass bills in numerous states.

LITTLE HOUSES ON THE PRAIRIE: In partnership with the U.S. Forest Service and other advocacy groups, The HSUS relocated 349 prairie dogs further into Wyoming's Thunder Basin National Grassland, saving them from likely poisoning; more than 1,400 prairie dogs have been moved since the project began in 2010.

Mass relocations have saved prairie dogs from poisoning.

THE LION'S SHARE: Seeking to prohibit the import of African lion trophies into the U.S., The HSUS, Humane Society International, and other animal protection groups filed a federal petition to classify the species as endangered. In Africa, HSI joined with the Born Free Foundation to build bomas, lion-proof barriers that protect cattle, sheep, and goats and help save lions from retaliatory killings.

EXOTIC EMERGENCY: Long before police in Zanesville, Ohio, shot nearly 50 exotic animals released from a private menagerie, The HSUS had been calling attention to the problem of captive exotics in the state. We conducted investigations, produced reports, and garnered pledges from state leaders to take action. After the tragedy, we worked with Gov. John Kasich, TV personality Jack Hanna, and state zoos and lawmakers to draft a bill banning private citizens from acquiring exotic animals.

LEVELING THE PLAYING FIELD: HSUS wildlife specialists helped nearly 90 communities adopt nonlethal techniques for resolving urban wildlife conflicts. We trained advocates, police officers, park officials, and more to humanely manage resident Canada goose populations and to keep coyotes safely away from people.

Canada's Seal Hunt: A Dying Industry

Since The HSUS began documenting Canada's massive annual seal slaughter in 2005—with video footage shown around the world—opposition to the killing has grown while the global demand for sealskins has plummeted. Total kills have dropped to a fraction of government-set quotas, with hundreds of thousands of young seals spared gruesome deaths at the hands of sealers.

We persuade legislators to pass tougher laws against animal fighting, help law enforcement bring criminals to justice, and rescue the animal victims of blood sports.

OUT OF THE SHADOWS: Aired on ESPN, our yearlong undercover investigation exposed 17 illegal cockfighting rings across Texas, documenting severe cruelty and other criminal activity at these events, where children were often present. The footage helped The HSUS pass a statewide ban on attendance at cockfights, possession of birds with intent to fight, and sale or possession of cockfighting weapons; we then helped train authorities in enforcing the new law. "I think that people in Texas were horrified to know that this was happening in the shadows," says John Goodwin, HSUS director of animal cruelty policy. "Most people there abhor cockfighting, and we saw an outpouring of support for this legislation when we put a spotlight on the issue." Elsewhere, The HSUS helped pass stronger animal fighting laws in Hawaii and New York, and we successfully campaigned to strengthen Mississippi's weak anti-cruelty penalties.

TIPPING THE SCALES: The HSUS's animal fighting tip program celebrated its 100th successful case in 2011, a conviction in a federal dogfighting case in Indiana. The program offers up to $5,000 for information leading to a successful dogfighting or cockfighting case—money that helps gain confidential informants, says The HSUS's Ann Chynoweth: "We've seen dozens of arrests and charges and convictions of people around the country that would not have happened but for this reward and people coming forward."

WE ARE THE HSUS

For Pittsburgh-based rescue Hello Bully, it can take months to prepare rescued pit bulls for life after dogfighting. Success stories remind founder Daisy Balajejder why the hard work is worth it. Chained to a tree in Florida, perky-eared Linus was rescued in April. Elderly Gia and her 10 puppies were removed from a North Carolina dogfighting operation in August.

In 2011, Balajejder became coordinator of The HSUS's Dogfighting Rescue Coalition, comprising 50+ shelters and rescues that placed nearly 70 dogs from HSUS-assisted cases throughout the year. Linus' adoptive family adores his gentle nature. And Gia loves being a couch potato with her new mom and canine siblings.
